■ The Toji

The Toji (literally East Temple), is the main temple of the Buddhist sect called Shingon (True-Words). It's formally known as Kyō-ō gokoku-ji (The Temple for the Defense of the Nation by Means of the Lord of Doctrines).

It was founded in 796 A.D., two years after the capital moved to Heian-Kyō. It was built at the eastside of the Rashōmon, the gate of the city, as a protection for the nation.

After the Buddhist priest Kōbō Daishi, known as Kōkai, was put in charge in 823, the temple became the main dojō of the Shingon sect. Known as the Kōbō Daishi's temple, it's still destination of religious believers that every morning come to visit and make offer to the deity. Every 21th of the month, the death anniversary of Kōbō Daishi, the temple is crowded of devoted who come on pilgrimage and a market is held there. The market is called "Kōbō san". In 1994 UNESCO designed it as part of the "Historic Monument of the Ancient Kyoto", World Heritage Site.

■ The Five-Story Pagoda

The Five-Story Pagoda, widely considered the symbol of the Toji, was founded in 823 by Kōbō Daishi. But it was destroyed 4 times by a fire and was rebuilt as we know it now in 1644, by order of Tokugawa Shogun, Iemitsu. It stands 55 m high and it's the tallest wooden tower in Japan.

The central pillar which pierces the five strata of the pagoda, is compared with Dainichi Nyorai(Mahavairocana Buddha) surrounded by four Tathagata Buddha and eight bodhisattva. Furthermore, on every pillar is depicted the Mandala of the two realms (Kongōkai Mandala), with the eight naga deities on the surface of the pillars and the eight great patriarchs on the walls. In the inner part of the first story of the pagoda a secret-space is decorated with bright colors. It's been told that ashes of Buddha brought from the Tang China by Kōbō Daishi are kept in the upper part of the central pillar.
